But you did! And you've always been so good at sorting out hard things. I think there might be a tiny part of me that's just not done with this relationship, because I know it's going to hurt. And I'm not OK with that. I am feeling better about all of this now, and I was feeling better yesterday, when I told my friend everything in a series of texts and emails. But I know it's not a fair way to think about things; I should do what I think is right and not be in a relationship with a friend I care about if I want to be with my boyfriend. And I don't want to. So there's still no clear resolution or decision, because the idea of just suddenly walking away still feels like kind of a cop-out or cowardly — not good things to think or act upon. But I've accepted that this is what I have to do. Anyway, this was what I said: Day 1: I have feelings for you, but I'm not sure if that's mutual, and also I think we need to stop talking to each other because it's just way too hard and confusing. Day 2: I think I still like you, but I also think we need to be best friends. I don't know how I should feel about you. I'm kind of confused by how I feel. Day 3: I really, really like you, but I also think we need to stop talking to each other. I think the one person I want is also the one person I can't be with right now. Day 4: There is really only one person I want to be with right now. I can't think about anyone else in the context of my relationship. I don't know why that is. I love you. * I know it sounds awful to feel so confused about something so important to you, but I'm not trying to be clinical or clever or make a phd dissertation out of this. This is real for me. Maybe you know someone who's thinking through a problem like this. Maybe you have some advice that's helped you get through a similar situation. Whatever. Here's the thing, though: I'm not sure how much weight I want to give any of the advice I might get. I'm not sure if I'm trying to be reasonable or someone else's idea of what's reasonable. I'm just going
