A: The following code should set up a global variable called solution which contains the string `solution = " " + ".join(solution_text) + " "` which will be used to insert the line of code into the file after each solution is found (this could be done using a function for the simplicity of this example). The code would then look like:

solution_text = r.text.strip() solution = " " + ".join(solution_text) + " " f = open("answers.txt", "a") f.write(solution)
f.close()

Extensive interstitial fibrosis predicts a poor outcome in idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis. Acute exacerbations and pulmonary function decline occur more frequently in idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis (IPF) patients with a worse prognosis. We examined whether these clinical and functional variables may predict an earlier onset of disease or the evolution of pulmonary function decline in a cohort of patients with IPF. We performed a prospective follow-up study in a cohort of 61 patients with IPF using a validated IPF screening tool and a questionnaire. The presence of interstitial changes with an extensive fibrosis pattern on chest high-resolution computed tomography (HRCT) was related to the worst HRCT score and the rate of change in pulmonary function ($\Delta\%FVC$) over time. We also looked for the differences in survival between the most recent HRCT scans. The mortality rate was 28% after a mean time of 33.8 ± 20.9 months. During the follow-up, 62% of the patients showed a progressive disease. The presence of extensive fibrosis was associated with a statistically significant worse FVC slope ($p = 0.04$) and a shorter time to reach an FVC 0.05). The diagnosis of IPF should be considered when a patient with more aggressive clinical evolution presents with extensive interstitial fibrosis.
