Consider the following code: HTML: click Javascript:

```
function foo() { console.log("foo"); if (typeof bar === "function") { bar(); } }

 Here, foo() will fire unless bar() returns something other than true. I figured as much, but when bar() fails, it just calls foo(), which throws an error. I thought this might have something to do with the Javascript || shortcircuiting behavior, but I ran into a funny situation when bar(). Here's what I did:

function foo() { console.log("foo"); if (typeof bar === "function") { bar(); } else { console.log("bar") } }

 It turns out that the else block runs, but only after foo() returns, which prevents bar() from even firing. Does anyone know why this behavior occurs? A: The if statement is evaluated after the function call. So, in the case that bar() is not a function, foo()
