Offering a special computer experience for young children, the Lenovo Smart Display allows parents to set customized daily routines that are displayed on the device. With the full capabilities of a home computer, Lenovo Smart Display uses voice technology and gesture detection to make the experience even more fun for kids. PROS: Remotely control the device through the included remote control Requires no configuration when the device is setup in the Home or Away modes Enhances the parental experience CONS: Not a dual screen device Poor performance when compared to other similar products Removes the ability to open multiple windows Conclusion: Lenovo Smart Display is a quite the child-friendly solution for any kind of user, but with the issue that it doesn't provide a dual screen, and thus is not a dual monitor solution. The combination of voice and gesture detection means that children can navigate the device from a remote location and be presented with a whole range of options, but once the experience is over and the device is switched off, the options are removed. At the same time, the device can be paired with the LG Mira when it's away, allowing it to be used in the same home. With all of the above, Lenovo Smart Display is definitely a worthy pick for the needs of any parent, and its capabilities make it a must-have addition to any family with young children. Description: MediaHint for Firefox is a browser extension that removes area limitations for various online media services such as Netflix, Pandora, Hulu and Spotify. The upper advantage of the extension is that no configuration is necessary, so user efforts are reduced to zero. The difference between MediaHint and similar products is that the former actually works.
