Human communication is a complex process, allowing for the transfer of information through non-verbal means. Acoustic vocalizations provide us with an important means of communication, helping to convey the message in an effective and efficient manner. In this regard, the analysis of the quality of communication and particularly of intonation, has been traditionally treated as a means of studying the speech production mechanisms. Recently, however, several lines of research have suggested that the type of intonation may also carry important communicative meanings. One of these meanings is motivational intonation, which in addition to providing the speaker with the means of enhancing inter-individual cooperation, may have another significant function, that of signalling state of mind. The present fMRI study describes the neural correlates of motivational intonation, carried out using an implicit paradigm, in which subjects had to judge the emotional content of the words uttered by a male speaker, who was either friend or enemy. We demonstrate that the recruitment of left amygdala and OFC regions during the processing of the motivational intonation, 79a2804d6b
