To avoid Diagbox software activation error and Windows XP installation issues, you'd better spend a bit on a crack but tested version Diagbox. .Absorbent articles, for example, sanitary napkins, are well known in the art. Sanitary napkins are typically configured as a composite structure having a fluid impervious backsheet, an absorbent core interposed between the backsheet and a wearer-contacting surface, and a fluid-permeable, nonwoven overlying the wearer-contacting surface. The absorbent core is typically constructed in an "hourglass" configuration having longitudinally-extending, laterally-spaced leg cuffs and an intermediate body portion. During use, the absorbent core is normally positioned with the longitudinal axis of the absorbent core disposed between the backsheet and the nonwoven overlying the wearer-contacting surface. The absorbent core may be positioned slightly off center so that one of the leg cuffs extends laterally farther from the midline of the absorbent article than the other leg cuff. This configuration helps position the longitudinal axis of the core transversely to the intended line of force of the wearer. Recent advances in the art have focused on the preparation of such absorbent cores from mixtures of tissue and superabsorbent materials. Such absorbent cores may be prepared by a wet-forming process wherein a mixture of tissue and superabsorbent material is passed through a nip formed between a pair of rotatable cylindrical screen rolls. As the material passes through the nip, the screen rolls squeeze water from the superabsorbent material to impart a desired consistency thereto. The wet formed composite is subsequently dried and then creped to form a coherent web. The wet creped web is then allowed to relax by running the web unsupported through a creper to enhance its structural properties. The use of high-absorbency superabsorbent polymers, such as neutralized cross-linked polyacrylates or methacrylate, in absorbent articles such as diapers and sanitary napkins is known. Absorbent articles containing such polymers 79a2804d6b
