A: He answered this question many years ago. Unfortunately, I cannot find a direct link to the article, so I will paraphrase his answer (because I found the quotes interesting): Most religions have some kind of "holy book" that the prophets or other religious leaders use to get their message across. This message is ostensibly moral, but is actually the message that their society considers itself to have discovered by their success in it, and justified by their ritual sacrifices of the prophets. In some religions there was a competition to who could write the most passionate, eloquent, and effective books that would trick the masses into believing their message. What is missing from religion is any kind of scientifically reasonable explanation for how their system might have arrived at the truth, or what might be the source for the truth. (Actually, even some sciences lack scientific evidence for how their theories might work. It is entirely possible that the universe is a gigantic computer simulation, but that we lack the intellectual capability to access it.) The people we call "prophets" have written some of the most passionate, eloquent, and convincing books that I have ever heard, including some by the founder of Satanism, who was convinced that his religion's basic beliefs were true. The men and women who choose to call themselves "Christian" or "Satanist" are entirely convinced that they have discovered the truth, and are often compelled to write a "holy book" and prove their belief with literalism. Other religions have stuck to the one book and one prophet per religion design. (Although there have been weird cases where certain rituals of the religion were performed without any kind of book or prophet. I wonder how those are justified.) Each of those religions compete with each other, because if they can't compete to get the most converts, the rest of the group is considered apostates. (Even though most of them are not particularly interested in converting the rest of the group anyway.) The competition leads to hatred of the apostates, and one of the main ways to ensure that they remain apostates is to kill those apostates. For example, I saw no shortage of hatred for Nazis among the Jewry and the Russian Jews, and given the opportunity, the Jews pursued them. Religions compete with each other to see who can sacrifice the most prophets. This competition leads to a worship of power, because the more prophets a prophet dies, the more real and meaningful is his message. In the end, it is the most
