Whatever one may think of the iPad design, the Adobe Photoshop Sketch app on iOS makes it very clear that the iPad Pro is meant to be an artists and designers workhorse. In my experience, I find that using an iPad Pro alongside my 5K Mac is an extremely efficient process when working on graphic design. The larger iPad screen also makes the iPad Pro far more comfortable to use than a smaller screen. All in all, I find myself using the iPad Pro with the Apple Pencil and iPad as my main design project tools on a daily basis. The drawing experience on the iOS platform is something I haven't felt since I first started working on the iPad. What I love about using Sketch on the iPad Pro is that I can work at any speed that I need to—from inking a simple part of a design on the iPad Pro, to adding lots of detail on the same part of a design on an iPad Air, and working on a larger version of the same design on the Mac. It's also great to be able to quickly and easily work on parts of artwork back and forth on the iPad Pro and then on the Mac at the same time, to see how changes look as they make their way back and forth.

Once you start to get comfortable with the drawing and sketching experience on the iPad Pro, you'll probably not want to stop using it. This, I think, will be a driving force on the adoption of the iPad Pro amongst creative professionals. However, some iPad Pro presentations I've seen have had only a single or even no iPad. The iPad Pro is certainly an ideal tool for presenting elaborate design work to a group of people. The iPad Pro is also a much more stable, ergonomic, and comfortable screen for prolonged screen time. Despite the fact that, for example, a MacBook Pro has a screen that is nearly 2x the resolution of an iPad Pro screen, the iPad Pro feels infinitely more physically comfortable to use than a MacBook Pro. The iPad Pro's screen gives off a much less "tinny" feeling than that of a MacBook Pro. The iPad Pro will also accommodate the Apple Pencil more easily than a MacBook Pro. The iPad Pro is also a bit less prone to picking up dust and lint, especially when used with a clean case. Furthermore, the iPad Pro is more supportive of Laptop at Work than a MacBook Pro. The iPad Pro's display is closer to that of 17-inch displays, which is excellent when preventing surface glare. All in all, if you work with Photoshop on your MacBook Pro, the iPad Pro is a no-brainer.

There are two reports created by Photoshop CC. You can select to have the logged details of the photo development imported into Adobe Lightroom. The details include camera/lens settings, film stock used and the development environment chosen. If you wish to include these details in your Lightroom import, simply select Import Photoshop Report (CS6) from the File > Import menu. from the File menu. If you have an image set for dry crop, keep your label, and delete the user marks, then you can add the metadata to your image in Lightroom. File > Export, you can open the exported file in Photoshop.

- Grid - provides a set of guides, often invisible, that makes it easy to keep your focus on the subject you are working on. I find the grid especially helpful when doing product photography or editing. You can align the grid using the top and bottom anchors for where the edges of your image will fall on the canvas. This means you won't need to glance away from the camera to figure out where you will need to crop.
