One of the things I really liked about Photoshop 2020 is that it makes it much easier to immediately see what's changed in your images since the last time you looked at them. One of the new features in the 5.1 update is the ability to show an "facial mask": This is a new tool that allows you to quickly and automatically remove the background from your subject's body—for example, to remove the background from a frame of a portrait. The new "blur" tool makes it very easy to apply filters to the background in Photoshop.

Photoshop 5.1 introduced a new, much easier way to crop an image: Drag a box over the area you want to remove, and the image will cut it out. The new "Automatic Backup" feature in Photoshop 2019 allows you to automatically back up your original documents, or an entire folder of documents. It creates a new folder (Backups) in the same folder as the original documents, and stores a restore point of the folder to a secure location on your hard drive.

You can now lock a group of selected files and folders, which makes it easy to e-mail to colleagues or upload to a web server at work. You can also exit Photoshop while a selected document is open, and later, if you return to the document later, you will be able to pick it up exactly where you left off.

Adobe Photoshop Creative Cloud subscription is still the Photoshop powerhouse, but it's fair to say that this release makes it very tempting to consider a Lightroom subscription instead. And even though I like having the ability to review files outside of Photoshop, the new sharing features in this release might make me consider the subscription all the more.

The feature that continues to amaze and frustrate photographers is the one that allows you to add a certain effect to a photo - retouching. Photographers and fine artists have long been able to retouch photos.

We have over 50,000 customers now who use Lightroom and that number is growing every day. We have literally shipped Lightroom to every continent on the planet and Lightroom continues to grow in popularity.

Although Photoshop has been around for over 20+ years, it does have a few quirks. For one, Adobe Photoshop is the only piece of software that handles RAW files natively. Essentially, RAW files are the photographed analog of digital files. RAW files are captured in a digital camera without any additional in-camera software changes being made. RAW files can be enormously versatile, however, they are not generally used for the creation of JPEG images. This is because they require extensive processing to be useful for toning, cropping, color adjustment, and other alterations. If you edit a RAW image in Photoshop, the changes you make are available for any of your other images in the Bridge. The only thing made visible in Bridge that isn't available in Lightroom are the emulations of options such as Smart Objects, Lens Corrections, Intelligent Sharpening, and Graduated Filter.

In short, Lightroom is a product build around a design team. This is a group of people gathered to create user experience to make you the photographer's workflow of choice. Our goal is to make it easy to find, manage, store, and relate your photographs.

This means that the 3D feature coming for customers can be upgraded at a discounted rate of $50 and after the As i said earlier, I think that Photoshop has just about had enough and it is clearly in need of a radical overhaul in terms of UI and features.
