The court agreed to hear the case of gay Mormon couples who want to have their existing marriages recognized in Utah while the ban stays in place. "We're very encouraged by this," Jeff Burum, one of the plaintiffs, said in a statement. "The Supreme Court finally agreed to hear an important case that is going to define the bounds of freedom for all Americans." Opponents of the ban say it is unconstitutional to prevent same-sex couples from marrying and cite long-standing traditions that once barred blacks and women from marrying. They say it is discriminatory to treat gay and lesbian couples differently than straight ones. The Supreme Court will first consider whether to take up the case, which could involve an immediate decision. If that doesn't happen, the justices could give the lower courts a chance to weigh in. In its challenge, Utah argues that the federal Defense of Marriage Act requires that the states be allowed to define marriage. Opponents of the law say it was passed hastily to keep from allowing the recognition of marriages performed in other states. "The U.S. Supreme Court today promised in another historic decision to recognize the right of married couples to have and to raise their family," President Barack Obama said in a statement. "This is yet another example of how the Supreme Court's interpretation of our Constitution is helping to deliver more opportunity for more of our citizens in the last two years than in the last two decades." In a five-day hearing last week, Justice Sonia Sotomayor questioned lawyers representing the Utah State Attorney General's Office and the state's largest city, Salt Lake City, that the federal ban violates the Constitution. Sotomayor, Obama's former chief judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd
