It's been a few months since I upgraded to Lightroom 5, so I won't directly compare images on my kindle HD to those on my Revo. I can, however, say with confidence that the images that I get from the SD card are a lot sharper and cleaner. They also look a lot more like my monitor than the images that I'd get from the Revo.

13.3" is a big jump for the screen size. To me, it's not big enough. It's like moving from a 14-inch monitor to a 15.5-inch monitor. You still might find the extra screen space welcome, but it's certainly not needed. If that doesn't bother you, then 13.3" should work just fine.

The days of Mac mini PCs are finally coming to an end. After being announced in December with little fanfare, it's finally available for consumers today at Apple.com for individual purchase. The Mac mini is ostensibly a solid retail box of a computer for the amateur. It can be set up with some basic software and solid components for reasonable prices. But will it be the right fit for every home? Let's find out.

The confusion in the market is tremendous after the events of last August, with Intel offering up its new Broadwell processors for Macs. Up until then, we'd assumed that Broadwell-based Macs were going to replace the existing iMac as Apple's core desktop. We were all wrong. Broadwell came to the iMac but not the Mac mini. Today, Apple simply said that Intel Macs and Mac mini PCs continue to be the best systems for those who want simplicity, power, and value. There may have been some confusion, but as the Mac mini is a $429 Apple device, it's unlikely to be confused for the iMac.

The problem, in the end, is that Photoshop is a photo editing app, but most of all, it is an art operating system. And when people come to Photoshop expecting to be able to use it like a raw image viewer, or a camera, or even a canvas, they are flummoxed. They can't use it as a creative working tool. And even when they begin to try this new model, they're fighting an app that knows it's a photo editing app and knows how to do that. But it doesn't always know how to do or let them do what they really want to set out to do.
