The secret to Photoshop's success is not the number of features available but rather that there's something in Photoshop for nearly anyone interested in image creation, even when they have little to no artistic experience.

In other words, Photoshop is more than just about being "taught." It's about empowering people to create great images. The fact that I can convert files in the two formats that I most often use, JPEG and TIFF, to DNG makes me especially happy. For years, I've been pushing Adobe to add support for compressed RAW file formats like DNG.

The SRP numbers for Adobe's image editing applications remain pretty high, but for a lot of photographers, they're still a large investment and they have to be on a supported platform. Even so, I'm now more comfortable using the application. I honestly don't think there's anything that I can't do in Photoshop or any of the other applications, even if I'm only an occasional user.

Adobe's been on a roll. For those that have been following its full-page ads for new software, you might remember debuting earlier this year their purchase of Dreamweaver CC, and the company's ongoing updates to the suite's existing lines. With all these features, I would be remiss if I didn't mention what is likely my favorite feature in Photoshop for 2020. Bringing a deep focus on image editing, Photo Flow generates beautiful portraits from pairs of similar photos in a matter of clicks and swipes. Often, its output looks straight out of a commercial photo studio. The process involves finding a frame of reference, such as a still object. With new features to enhance your creative process, keep growing your business with custom printing, and keep ahead of the curve with the release of Adobe Sensei AI tools, this update brings you a ton of new ways to maximize your experience. In retrospect, a huge part of my success as a photographer has been the time I've put into learning up Photoshop. As the product evolves, I find it especially rewarding to see Photoshop mature over time and stay relevant. So far, I can say I wouldn't trade my current experience for anything. This comes with some risk and I look forward to exploring the new college in the skies.
