The role of cognitive restructuring in the treatment of panic disorder. This study examined the role of cognitive restructuring in the treatment of panic disorder. Anxiety levels were assessed in 63 patients with panic disorder, as well as the efficacy of cognitive restructuring in reducing panic-related symptomatology. Patients were randomly assigned to a cognitive restructuring group that received cognitive restructuring with breathing retraining, and a no-intervention control group that received a non-effective treatment. Patients were clinically tested at base line, after one session and at two month follow up. Compared to the control group, patients in the cognitive restructuring condition significantly decreased their self-reported depression and anxiety levels and significantly improved their self-reported ability to cope with anxiety. The effect of cognitive restructuring was independent of measures of social desirability and, although the effects were modest, they were maintained at follow-up. Cognitive restructuring appears to be a promising intervention for the treatment of panic disorder. Laparoscopic colorectal surgery in children. Advancements in laparoscopic surgical techniques now permit minimally invasive approaches for a variety of surgical conditions in children. Colorectal surgery has traditionally been performed through a laparotomy incision with large trocars to gain access to the abdominal cavity. The small size of the first trocar that is used to insert the laparoscope enables manipulation with instruments placed through the subcutaneous space, thus reducing the size of the incision. The standard surgical instruments can be used for the mobilization of the colon or rectum. Transabdominal resect and anastomosis can be performed laparoscopically. Extending the laparoscopic approach to low anterior resection of the colon is technically challenging, however, because the laterally curling mesentery is not readily accessible to a laparoscope. In this report, we describe three children with pseudomembranous colitis, one with a perforated Crohn's colitis, and one with intussusception who had laparoscopic-assisted low anterior resections.
