Parts of the UI functionality got a new look in Photoshop CC, as well as a slew of new tagging features. The Brushes tool got a major overhaul in this release, and it looks like the brushes provided by Adobe are the most basic ones. When you want to create a brush compatible with Creative Cloud, then you'll have to subscribe. I am not sure I missed anything here. If you like to make your own brushes on your own workspaces, then this is something that is missing the way it was before. And like in the past, the new brushes that have been provided by Adobe are not intelligent enough. So you will have to make this work for yourself.

But these new brushes are quite usable. In my opinion, the best type to make your own brush are the gradient brushes. I do not think that Adobe had the knowledge or skills to create a smart gradient brush. The only smart feature that I can see is the "how to use" section. It is not wonderful yet, but I'm pretty sure that this will improve over time.
